

Communication Pigtail Model Description

Overview

Lasswell in 1948, the model defines communication as the intentional act of one person directing a message to another. Applying the right model in modern tools is crucial. This model breaks down the communication act into five key components that answer this question: Who says what, in which channel, and to whom, with what effect?

A communication model is a theoretical framework that describes how messages are sent, received, and understood between people or systems. The sender needs to use pictures, words and gestures carefully in order to induce the desired effect in the receiver. Receiver: The receiver is the.
